Jake and David looked at each other. Being good friends for many years, they knew that by looking at each other's face, they agreed that the camp's concert was getting long and boring.

David leaned over to Jake and whispered, "Let's sneak out of here or I am going to die of boredom(17)

"Where do you want to go(18)" Jake asked. "You know that the counsellors are not going to let us out of this place."

"Let's pretend that we need to go to the washroom and I will meet you at the gate before the entrance to the woods(19)" David said in a hushed tone.

"That's not a good idea," Jake answered.

Part 4 : Comprehension MCQ (5 Marks)

Read the passage below carefully and answer the question 20 to 24

Once there were twenty-five tin soldiers, who were all brothers, for they had been made out of the same old tin spoon. They shouldered arms and wore splendid uniforms, in red and blue. The soldiers were exactly alike, except one, who had only one leg. He had been left to the last, and then there was not enough of the melted tin to finish him, so they made him to stand firmly on one leg.

The table on which the tin soldiers stood, was covered with other playthings, but the most attractive to the eye was a pretty little paper castle. In front of the castle, a few little trees surrounded a piece of looking-glass, which represented a transparent lake. Swans made of wax were on the lake. All this was very pretty, but the prettiest of all was a tiny little lady who stood at the open door of the castle. She was also made of paper and she wore a light blue chiffon dress. As she was a dancer, she stretched out both her arms and raised one of her legs so high. The tin soldier thought that she was like himself who had only one leg.

"That is the wife for me," he thought. "She lives in a castle, while I have only a box to live in. Still I must try and make friends with her." When evening came, the other tin soldiers were all placed in the box, and the people of the house went to bed. Then the playthings began to have their own games together. The tin soldiers rattled in their box but they could not open the lid. Only the tin soldier and the dancer remained in their places. She stood on tiptoe, with her legs stretched out, as firmly as he did on his one leg. He never took his eyes off her for even a moment. The clock struck twelve, up sprang the lid of the jack-in-the-box. Instead of a clown, out jumped a little black goblin.

The little black goblin grabbed the tin soldier and threw him out of the window. As the tin soldier fell, he wondered if he would ever see the dancer again.

Rama had never been to school. Like many of the other dhobis, he (25) _____ not read or write. He earned money by helping his Uncle Ganesan (26) _____ his washing business. He learnt how to collect the laundry from the big houses, how to behave while he (27) _____ there and how to listen carefully for instructions. He also learnt how to use the rocks for beating the dirt out, and how to spread the fabrics out (28) _____ the flat ground to dry.

Last of all, he learnt the skill of sorting and folding the dry washing (29) _____ bundles to be returned to the houses. This was probably the most difficult task. As they could not read or write, the dhobis had invented their own methods of marking the washing piles so they never got muddled up. One mistake in this could lose a dhoby his job.

Part 9: Comprehension Open- Ended (10 Marks)

Read the passage carefully and answer questions 50 to 54.

My father was not what you would call an educated man and I doubt if he had read twenty books in his life. But he was a marvellous story-teller. He used to make up a bedtime story for me every single night, and the best ones were turned into serials and went on for many nights running.

It was impossible to be bored in my father's company. He was too sparky a man for that. Plots and plans and new ideas came flying off him like sparks from a grindstone. "It is windy today," he said one Saturday morning. "Just right for flying a kite. Let's make a kite, Danny."

So we made a kite. He showed me how to splice thin sticks together in the shape of a star, with some more sticks across the middle to brace it. Then we cut up an old blue shirt of his and stretched the material across the frame-work of the kite. We added a long tail made of thread, with little leftover pieces of the shirt tied at intervals along it. We found a ball of string in the workshop and he showed me how to attach the string to the kite so that it would be properly balanced in flight.

Together we walked to the top of the hill behind the filling-station to release the kite. I found it hard to believe that this object, made only from a few sticks and a piece of old shirt, would actually fly. I held the string while my father held the kite, and the moment he let it go, it caught the wind and soared upward like a huge blue bird.

"Let out some more, Danny!" he cried. "Go on! As much as you like!"

What I have been trying so hard to tell you all along is simply that my father, without the slightest doubt, was the most marvellous and exciting father any boy ever had.

Adapted from Danny, The Champion of the World by Roald Dahl
